OUR STORY

Since our founding in 1968, the Studio Museum in Harlem has served as the nexus for artists of African descent locally, nationally, and internationally. The Studio Museum opened during a time of unbridled protest within the art world and the whole of society, with young artists and artists of color demanding representation in museums and cultural institutions. In response, a small group of fiercely determined artists, philanthropists and civic leaders came together to create a new kind of museum — an institution that would not only advocate for artists of African descent but be a vital link between artists and community in the cultural capital of Black America. The Studio Museum's innovative exhibitions, programs, and publications have defined historical themes and concepts, set scholarly standards, and provided support for generations of artists of African descent who would have otherwise been lost to the 20th-century cultural narrative.
